Fast Fashion

Fast fashion refers to the rapid production of cheap, trendy clothing that is quickly made available to consumers. While it seems like a convenient way to stay stylish at a low price, fast fashion has both positive and negative aspects. On the positive side, fast fashion allows people to keep up with the latest fashion trends without spending too much. However, the speedy production process often leads to poor working conditions for factory workers and environmental problems. Fast fashion contributes to approximately 92 million tons of textile waste annually and is responsible for almost 10% of global carbon emissions and about 20% of global wastewater production. To address these concerns, Uniqlo has introduced a recycling program where customers can bring their unwanted clothing to stores. Despite such industry attempts, environmental problems caused by fast fashion still remain. As consumers, we should be mindful about the broader impact of our fashion decisions.
